
From: Michael Leidig [REDACTED]
Sent: 13 December 2013 07:00
To: Markus Braun [REDACTED]
Subject: Renewable Energy

Dear Markus,

I know you are very busy so will attempt to keep it brief.

One of the projects we have been supporting with journalism through Journalism without Borders is an agricultural school in southern Sudan run by an Austrian. He has managed to get a large discount on a solar power system from an Austrian firm called eco-tec and over a year ago now they installed it to provide power for the school project. It has now been running for a year without any problems and has been a good advert for the system in the region. Several nearby villages would like to acquire it and there is a city as well where a number of business people have asked if my Austrian contact might be able to help them yet a similar system. They do seem to have some money to pay for it although not all that they would need, and my contact tells me that there is the money to buy the electricity in the local population from businesses and some residential users. I said I would ask you given your special interest in renewable energy and the fact that it's Africa with plenty of sun whether you felt there might be some potential for a business model and if so I'd be happy to put you in contact with my contact, but only if you think it would be interesting, I don't want to waste your time.

Over to you.

Best

Michael Leidig,
Central European News (CEN) Ltd,

[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]